THE CRITIC TALKS TO MUSIC LOVERS

Weekly Comment on Things Musical in Discriminating Philadelphia

THE tragic death in Boston last Friday of Lieutenant James Reese Europe, the famous colored leader of the equally famous band of the 360th infantry, at the hands of one of his own men, calls to mind the fact that it was in Philadelphia the evening before that he conducted his last full concert. The band which Lieutenant Europe organized and led with such popular success was made up of a curious assortment of a skilled musician hearing it for the first instruments, and it is accredited with being the forerunner of the popular tribulation to the musician after one or two numbers have been played.

It must not be supposed for a moment that Lieutenant Europe was a to "get it across." man of mere organizing ability and that had no musical gifts. On the contrary, he had decided musical talents. which, as said before, is a strong char acteristic of those members of the colored race who are musically inclined, as most of them are. The work of the drummers (one of whom was the slayer drummers (one of whom was the slayer of his chief the following day) was a really remarkable achievement in the faultless rhythmical sense displayed, as well as in the actual manipulation of the instruments. This, however, seems to be a sine qua non in music of this character. There was also a considerable amount of technique of execution displayed by many of the performers, the weak point being an almost universal renighness and coarseness of tone.

Another favorite device of "jazz" music seems to be what may be termed an illegitimate use of certain of the instruments; No piece was apparently complete without several car-rending complete without several car-rending brays from the trombones (and, remember, there were six of them), while one of the clarinetists produced some shricks from a seemingly harmless instrument that strongly reminded the hearers of a rooster with an exceptionally powerful lung canacity and a bad cold. These were obviously done to amuse the audience, and they achieved their purpose admirably. However, it may be questioned which the symphony Chest's completed the courses.

However, it may be questioned whether these effects were worse musically than some of Richard Strauss's in the "Sinfonier Domestica," "Don Quixote" or the "Alpine Symphony," although the purpose of the latter was apparently more serious.

ONE interesting feature of the concert was the performance of what the program termed a "highbrow number," the selection for this position of honor being Reissiger's overture to the ypera "The Mill on the Cliff." The writer, who was attending his first "jazz" concert, partly from motives of curiosity, had frequently been told that these bands "can play good music just as well as any if they wanted to." Well, perhaps they can, but at all eveats they didn't.

The question of just how much claim an overture to a comic opera by Reissiger has to being "highbrow music" heed not be entered into, but in any case if is a well-constructed, well-written piece of music, with an abundance of light melodies, several of which are developed with great skill.

Lieutenant Europe and his band apparently had little idea of the way to play a work of this kind. He took the allegro furioso with which it opens (it is in 2-2 time) at a very moderate pace, beating four to the ineasure. The main movement of the overture was in more accurate accord overture was in more accurate accord with the tempo indications of the composer, but there was no shading and where the theme lay in the middle or lower voices it was completely lost in "Seventeen," has played the part so often that "baby taik" has become a the countermelodies of the louder and habit, and in order to break herself of
